The Village of Patones

Patones is one of the most picturesque Spanish villages in the Community of Madrid. All the houses are made of slate (pizarra) with red tile roofs (tejados de tejos). The streets of grass and cobblestones (adoquines) wind delightfully around the village. Patones is isolated from the rest of civilization, nestled (anidado) among the rolling (ondulante) green hills of the Sierra Pobre of Madrid. The village seems to be lost in time and you almost expect (casi esperar) Rip Van Winckle to appear from behind the rustic village cemetery, or to see a shepherdess (pastora) dressed in 18th century clothes, scrubbing (frotando) her dresses on the stones at the open air washing place (lavadero) next to the stream (riachuelo), where four centuries of villagers have washed and rinsed (esclarecido) their clothes.

The King of Patones

Ask your students about Patones de Arriba. It is a jewel (joya) in the heart (corazón) of the "Sierra Pobre". Patones is picturesque (pintoresca) little village (pueblo) of traditional slate (pizarra) walls, cobble-stone (adoquines) streets and red-tiled roofs (tejadros). It is completely hidden (escondido) from the rest of the valley, because it is nestled (anidado) back in the hills (montes) of the Sierra. Not much has changed in Patones since (desde) the Shepherd King of Patones in 1713 sent a letter to Carlos III, King of the Spanish Empire (which covered half of the world) at his royal palace in Madrid. The letter was from his Royal Highness (realeza) of Patones to his Royal Highness of Spain and in the letter he treated King Carlos III as an equal (although (aunque) Patones was a little village of only (solamente) 25 houses). King Carlos was so (tan) furious to find out (enterarse) there was another (otro) King in Spain, and less than fifty km from Madrid, the centre of the Spanish world empire, that he sent (mandó) his elite storm troops (tropas) the next morning to Patones. They met (encontraron) no resistance from the inquisitive shepherds and young maidens (doncellas) who were busy (ocupadas) bringing water from the well (pozo) to their houses. The poor Shepherd King of Patones was dragged (arrastrado) back to Madrid in chains (cadenas), taken before his Majesty King Carlos and ordered (obligado) to bow (bajar) his head in shame (vergüenza) before the only world monarch. He was then soundly thrashed (duramente azotado) for his impudence and sent back to Patones with no crown (corona) on his head. And so (así) ended the royal kingdom (reino) of Patones.

Skiing in Spain

Spain is ranked second in the World among tourists looking to find sand, sun and sangria. However, as the colder winter months set in and snow begins to fall, the atmosphere in Spain changes. Though not known for its mountains and ski resorts like countries such as Switzerland, winter activities such as skiing and snowboarding are gaining popularity every year.

There are numerous options for skiers of all levels throughout Spain, and options for those who want to take a day trip or spend an entire weekend hitting the slopes. About an hour outside of Madrid lays the Navacerrada, which boasts trails for beginners, intermediates and advanced skiers, and offers an option of six resorts for those who want to stay overnight.

Should you want to get away from the city for awhile, the Pyrenees offer excellent skiing for those with at least a little experience. Beginners are welcome at all resorts, though some may find sitting by the fire in the lodge more comfortable than falling down the trails time and time again. Here, the Beaqueira Beret is considered the "it" spot to ski, as the Spanish national team practices here and the quality of snow exceeds other places in the Pyrenees and throughout the country.

Still, there's no limit on what region one has to go to in order to ski. The Sierra Nevada in the south of Spain is home to numerous ski resorts, and if the outdoors just is not your style, the Xanadu shopping mall outside of Madrid has an indoor slope.

So while it is true that Spain is known for the Costa Blanca, warm Mediterranean waters and parties on Ibiza, winter loving folks have nothing to fear as the opportunities for skiing, snowboarding and other winter activities exist and are increasing throughout the country. So strap on some skis and take advantage of the hidden winter gems that Spain has to offer.

Kyriacos Spanos

"My name is Kyriacos and I was born in Cyprus. My father grew up in Australia from Cypriot parents, but when he met my mum he returned to Cyprus in order to settle down there. I grew up in Cyprus and my parents showed me the importance of the English language at a very young age by sending me to a private American school. After I graduated from high school I went to London to study one of my other favorite subjects, business. Living in London was a great experience because London is a diversified and multicultural city. Therefore, getting to know all these different cultures and backgrounds made me broaden my horizons even more. Becoming an English teacher and working in education was something I always wanted to do. Having the ability to teach and help other people succeed in their education and careers is my biggest motivation.

Marta Delgado

Marta is currently working as an accountant and is studying to become a nurse. She is preparing the Cambridge First Certificate Examination in September 2014. Marta is one of the students who inspire me the most because she loves the English language and she is very determined to learn.
